Catechism on Holy Week

I've been remiss in keeping up with this catechism – my apologies! A lot of time has been expended in trying to deal with much physical pain. But I think I've turned a corner on it.

On Holy Tuesday, there was only one change, and it was the suppression of the passage of St. Mark (14:1-31). This is an account of the institution of the Holy Eucharist, and it was used for the faithful to see the relation between the Institution, and the sacrifice of the Passion. I do not see any reason for this suppression. The verses are sufficiently short in number that just to save time seems not to be the reason, and given the importance of the connection of the Institution and the Passion, to eliminate these verses does not seem to be motivated by a desire for mere simplicity (as strong as that desire was for the reformers). I think, therefore, that it has to do with the elimination of all the verses which warn the faithful about bad communions from the Novus Ordo. The suppression of the above verses is an early move toward this. And the motive behind that is connected, I think, with the great desire for ecumenism, that Protestant Christians would not find an obstacle in this. For them, it seems to me, it would not be possible to receive the Eucharist to one's own damnation. After all, it's just a piece of bread in their churches.

On Holy Wednesday, we see a similar suppression of St. Luke's Gospel (22:1-39). This, too, is about the connection between the Institution and the Passion. This is the third place where the connection was suppressed.

From the Pastor:

- The intention of the Thursday Holy Hour is for all the parishioners of OLMC who have left the practice of the Faith, that they might repent before it is too late.

- “The same piety that moves the faithful to Eucharistic Adoration attracts them to a deeper participation in the Mass.” (Congregation of Divine Worship - 2001)

- Going back to Thomas Storck, his observation about conservatives is as cogent as his comments about liberals.

But what of conservatives? Conservatives are very aware of the dangers that the unrestrained pursuit of sexual pleasure poses to society, of its power to create any number of social pathologies.

Conservatives quite rightly point to the stabilizing influence of intact families and to the many benefits such families bring to the whole social fabric. They rightly are concerned that the selfish pursuit of individual pleasure harms others, such as children and abandoned spouses, as well as society as a whole. They likewise realize that when society allows free play to the passion for unrestrained sexual pleasure, people in general will begin to look at every relationship and transaction with solely an eye for their own personal pleasure. The desire for erotic satisfaction tends to color the whole of the life of society.

Moreover, conservatives are quite willing to employ the power of the law to ensure that the pursuit of pleasure is kept within bounds. They advocate tax policies that favor families, laws preventing same-sex unions, making divorce and abortion more difficult, restrictions on the sale of contraceptives to minors, even harsh laws on teenage sex. Conservatives realize that the mere fact of the existence of a desire for a maximum of sexual pleasure on the part of individuals does not give those individuals any right to pursue that desire at the expense of the common good of society.

But while laudably alarmed at the potentially corrosive power of the unrestrained pursuit of sexual pleasure and ready to take legal steps to curb that power, conservatives suddenly embrace a free-for-all attitude when it comes to money. Individuals want to get rich, only envious liberals and socialists want to prevent this. No matter how much the unrestrained pursuit of wealth may harm the common good, none of this matters. The effects of wage stagnation on marriages and families, the devastation of neighborhoods and cities by companies moving abroad simply in order to get the highest return on their investment with no regard for society—none of this matters. From being zealous for the common good and ready to place all manner of restraints on human conduct in the sexual realm, conservatives run to the other extreme and embrace a policy of laissez-faire when it comes to money. They even invent an ideology that pretends that the pursuit of private wealth somehow redounds to the benefit of all, despite much experience showing the falsity of this. It is hard to understand how conservatives do not see, or profess not to see, that the unrestrained and anti-social pursuit of money can do as much harm to the social fabric as the unrestrained pursuit of sexual pleasure. But conservatives do not see this. A disordered notion of freedom constitutes almost their entire approach to economic morality.

celebrated on August 22nd for the Immaculate Heart of Mary.

Adult Catechism

Fr. Jackson will have his adult catechism classes on Tuesdays, August 20th, and 27th, from 7-8pm in the parish library. All adults 16 and over are welcome.
