Defécit in dolóre vita mea

From Fr. Krager

Selected quotations from the classic Spiritual Combat by Lorenzo Scupoli:

“The presumptuous man is persuaded that he has acquired a distrust of himself and a confidence in God; but this mistake is never more plainly discovered than when some fault is committed. If he gives way to vexation and despairs of advancing in the way of virtue, it is evident he placed his confidence in himself, not in God; and the greater the anxiety and despondence, the greater certainty of his guilt.”

“Consider, that if the fury of your enemies be great, and their number immense, still the love which God bears you is infinitely greater. The angels who protect you, and the saints who intercede in your behalf, are still more numerous.”

“All God demands of you is, that you defend yourself courageously, and that notwithstanding any wounds you may possibly receive, you never lay down your arms nor quit the field. Finally, that you may not be wanting to your duty, remember that this war is unavoidable, and that we must either fight or die; as the fury and obstinacy of your enemies is such, that all peace and truce with them is utterly impossible.”

“The instant you find yourself affected by any unforeseen injurious treatment, put yourself on your guard, give not way to vexation, but raising your mind to God, consider what has happened to be an appointment of Heaven; that God Himself, that tender Father, has no other view in permitting it but to purify you still more, and unite you still nearer to Himself, and that He is infinitely pleased to see you cheerfully undergo the greatest trials for his sake.”

“When you look up at the sun, reflect that your soul, when adorned with sanctifying grace, is incomparably more bright and beautiful than all the firmament together; but that destitute of it, she is fouler than Hell itself. In viewing the sky, soar in spirit to Heaven itself, and there dwell, where you are sure of reigning for all eternity, if you live in innocence and sanctity on earth.”

“Consider that the evils of this life, however frightful they may appear, are only imaginary, as they cannot deprive us of real good. God ordains or permits them as punishments for sin, opportunities for merit, or for other reasons, which, though hidden from us, are truly equitable.”

“If regret of past sins tends to your greater humiliation; and if it increases your fervor in performing good works and your confidence in the Divine Mercy, you ought to receive it with great thankfulness. But if it occasions anxiety; if it renders you dispirited, slothful, timorous and backward in your duty, you may certainly conclude that it proceeds from suggestions of the enemy, and ought to pass over it without the least regard.”

“You will discover that it is the heart which influences you in your good works, through a motive of love, when all you do for God seems little, and after doing your best, you are ashamed at having done so little.”

“God permitted Saint Peter to deny him and forswear any knowledge of his Lord, that he might return to the knowledge of himself, and lay aside his dangerous presumption. [It is similar with Paul, whose thorn in the flesh kept him from pride in his revelation.]”
